“ I'm missing the fact that you are not a phone call away but I can't imagine what it would be like to think we would never meet again! I'm so thankful we have the promise of heaven when we accept the gift of salvation. We will meet again!

“ Ms. Nell would bring laughter to those around her. She loved the Lord and demonstrated her love through creative ways of showing love to others. She consistently, with joy, prepared meals for others within her home, providing an opportunity for fellowship, bonding, and strength. One precious memory was a time when the adults and teens alike were trying to raise funds for camp. Because a meal prepared by Ms. Nell was always a precious blessing, she offered up ten reservations for a five course meal. She and Mr. Ray literally hosted a very fancy meal for those who purchased the opportunity to enjoy this meal. The funds went towards camp for the teens and Mr. Ray and Ms. Nell graciously offered their time, labor, and covered the cost of the meal. Kindest of hearts, caring towards others, committed to Christ. We miss them both.

“ I found this beautiful analogy, thought I would share.
Grief is like glitter. In the beginning, it's everywhere.. on your hands, in your hair, scattered across every corner of your life. You try to clean it up, to restore some sense of order. And for a while, it seems like you've succeeded. But then, one day, you move a sofa or open a forgotten drawer, and there it is again. A tiny sparkle that catches the light and reminds you of what you lost.
It doesn't go away completely. It settles, becomes quieter, less overwhelming. You learn to live with it, to carry it gently. And years later, when you find a bit of that glitter tucked behind a shelf, you might smile. Maybe even laugh. Because it reminds you of love, of connection, of someone who mattered deeply.
Eventually, something will catch your eye.. a photo, a favorite song, a familiar scent, and instead of pain, you'll feel warmth. That's the quiet truth about grief. It stays with you, but it changes. It becomes a part of your story, a soft echo of the love that never really left.
